c. Evangelical prophet: a designation of Isaiah, representing the view that his writings describe prophetically the life of Christ, and the state of things under the Gospel dispensation, and that they abound in anticipations of the doctrines revealed in the Gospel.

The idea is due to St. Jerome, in whose writings it frequently occurs in various forms: e. g. he says (Ad Paulam, Wks. 1575 III. 18) that Isaiah 'non tam propheta dicendus est quam evangelista.'

1547 Homilies i. Falling from God ii. (1859) 85 The evangelical Prophet Esay..doth teach us. 1585 Abp. 2. Since the Reformation adopted as the designation of certain theological parties, who have claimed that the doctrines on which they lay especial stress constitute 'the Gospel'. This claim is of course disallowed by their adversaries, but (as in the case of other self-assumed party names) the designation has received the sanction of general usage.

a. = Protestant. Now only with reference to Germany and Switzerland, where its German and French equivalents are also applied in narrower sense to the Lutheran as distinguished from the 'Reformed' or Calvinistic Church. In the German Empire 'The Evangelical Church' is the official name of the established Protestant Church of Prussia, formed in 1817 by the union of the Lutheran and Reformed churches.

(1839) 345 They should maintain two companies of evangelical soldiers. 1845 S. Austin Ranke's Hist. Ref. III. v. iii. 109 The evangelical communes became aware of their superiority.

b. From 18th c. applied to that school of Protestants which maintains that the essence of 'the Gospel' consists in the doctrine of salvation by faith in the atoning death of Christ, and denies that either good works or the sacraments have any saving efficacy.

Other features more or less characteristic of the theology of this school are: a strong insistence on the totally depraved state of human nature consequent on the Fall; the assertion of the sole authority of the Bible in matters of doctrine, and the denial of any power inherent in the Church to supplement or authoritatively interpret the teaching of Scripture; the denial that any supernatural gifts are imparted by ordination; and the view that the sacraments are merely symbols, the value of which consists in the thoughts which they are fitted to suggest. As a distinct party designation, the term came into general use, in England, at the time of the Methodist revival; and it may be said, with substantial accuracy, to denote the school of theology which that movement represents, though its earlier associations were rather with the Calvinistic than the Arminian branch of the movement. In the early part of the 19th c. the words 'Methodist' and 'Evangelical' were, by adversaries, often used indiscriminately, and associated with accusations of fanaticism and 'puritanical' disapproval of social pleasures. The portion of the 'evangelical' school which belongs to the Anglican church is practically identical with the 'Low Church' party. In the Church of Scotland during the latter part of the 18th and the early part of the 19th c. the two leading parties were the 'Evangelical' and the 'Moderate' party.

[1747 Doddridge Life Col. Gardiner 162 It was his deliberate Judgment, that the Law should be preached, as well as the Gospel; and hardly any Thing gave him greater Offence, than the irreverent Manner in which some, who have been ignorantly extolled as the most zealous Evangelical Preachers, have sometimes been tempted to speak of the former.] 1791 Hampson *Mem. Also contracted 7 eevn, ev'n, 9 dial. e'en. See also EVE. [OE. æfen, efen, ifern, neut. and masc., cogn. with OFris. ávond, ẽwnd, OS. âband (Du. avond), OHG. âband (MHG. âbent, mod.G. abend) masc.; perh. also with the synonymous ON. aptann, aftann (Sw. afton, Da. aften), though this may be of different origin, cogn. with AFTER. The OE. forms appear to agree only in the root (OAryan ĕp or ĕbh) with the other Teut. forms: the OTeut. type of the OHG., OS., OFris. forms would be ẽbando-*, that of the OE. æfen, efen would be ẽbinjo-* or ẽbunjo-*. The ONorthumb. efern is app. an alteration of efen(n; cf. ONorthumb. wæstern, festern (= WS. wæsten, fæsten), and OFris. forms like epernia to open.

One hypothesis as to the relation of the forms is that ẽbando-* represents a pre-Teut. ĕpont-*, a pr. pple. act., and that derivatives of a corresponding passive pple. occur in ON. aptann (:—ĕptono-*) and OE. æfen (:—ẽbunjo-* :—ĕptuyo-* or ĕpuyo-*). The etymological sense is unknown; a not inappropriate meaning for the act. and pass. formations is suggested by Gr. ἤπιος, mild, gentle (sometimes used with reference to temperature) which may possibly belong to the same root.]

9. Intimating that the sentence expresses an extreme case of a more general proposition implied (= Fr. même). Prefixed (in later use often parenthetically postfixed) to the particular word, phrase, or clause, on which the extreme character of the statement or supposition depends.

This use, now the prevailing one in Eng., is foreign to the other Teut. langs. It is rare in purely dialectal speech, and (though a natural development of 8) seems not to have arisen before the 16th c. Cotgrave 1611 does not give even among the equivalents of Fr. mesme. The phrase not even (= L. ne .. quidem) is rare in early use; Cooper Lat. Dict. 1572 renders ne in publicis quidem by 'no, not in common affaires' (though for ne nunc quidem he has 'no, not euen now': see 6 b); Walker Dict. Particles 1673 renders ne .. quidem only by 'no, not so much as'; the earliest Lat. Dict. that gives 'no, not even' is app. Ainsworth 1736.

Connexion of some kind with OE. á, Ay is probable on account of the sense.

If it be a compound of á, the second element should begin with f (or less probably with b), and contain the vowel i or ĭ. The most plausible suggestion hitherto made is that of Cosijn (Taalk Bijdragen II. 267), that it is equivalent to Goth. aiw fatrhwan* 'ever in life'; cf. the common OE. phrase á tó feore in similar sense; also OHG. neonaltre never, lit. 'never in life'. This is supported by the agreement of the final -a of the ONorthumb. æfra with the ending of the locative (dat.) of the -u declension, to which the sb. feorh life (:—ferhwus*) originally belonged. The recorded forms of feorh, however, do not account for the umlaut; but cf. the cognate OE. firas, OS. firihôs, ON. firar 'men'. A different suggestion has been made by Prof. G. Hempl in Mod. Lang. Notes IV. (1889) 417, viz. that the word is an adverbial case of a subst. compound f. á+byre (:—burī) event, occasion. On this view its formation would be closely analogous to that of Ger. jemals. With regard to the umlaut Prof. Hempl compares ærende:—ārundi*; with regard to the f from b he compares wéfod for wēb-bed* (or -bēod).

The OE. ælc, ylc, was a compound of á, synonymous with æfre; but, owing to umlaut and contraction, the etymological force of the word had become obscured, and æfre was prefixed in order to express more distinctly the original sense. Although the phrase was always written in OE. (as sometimes in ME.) as two words, it had in 10th c. already come to be felt as a compound, and when it is governed by a prep. this is placed before the first of the two words. The forms marked α descend from æfre ælc, and the β forms, including the mod. every, from æfre ylc. It does not appear that æfre was prefixed to the other two words, æghwilc and gehwilc, which enter into the history of EACH.]

I. As adj. used attrib.

1. Used to express distributively the sense that is expressed collectively by all.

Originally this sense was expressed by each, from which every differed only in emphasizing the element of universality in the signification. Thus Wyclif writes 'euery langour and eche sekenesse,' it being unnecessary to repeat the emphasis. When every had ceased to be recognizable as a compound of each, the two words were at first often used somewhat indiscriminately, but their functions were gradually differentiated. In mod. usage, every directs attention chiefly to the totality, each chiefly to the individuals composing it. It may also be observed that each usually refers to a numerically definite group, in contrast to the indefinite universality expressed by every; thus 'Each theory is open to objection' relates to an understood enumeration of theories, but 'Every theory is open to objection' refers to all theories that may exist.

Everything (e·vəriˌ-, e·vˈriˌþiŋ), pron.

1. A combination of EVERY (sense 1) and THING. As in anything, something, nothing, the subst. element has usually no definable meaning, the compound being equivalent to a neuter absol. use of the adj. The distributive sense etymologically belonging to the word is often absent, its force being merely collective; hence it is the current substitute for all (absol.), all things, which in most contexts are now somewhat formal. Often followed by adj., as everything good = 'all that is good'. Formerly written as two words; this is now rare, exc. where the two words are used without modification of sense.

The form evel, whence the mod. form descends, appears in ME. first as west midland and Kentish, but in 15th c. had become general. The conditions under which early M.E. (i) or (ü) became (e), the antecedent of mod Eng. (i), are not clearly determined; the present word and weevil seem to be the only examples in which this change was other than local; obs. and dial. instances are yeve = 'give', leve = 'live', EASLE. (Other apparent examples are due to OE. forms with eo, resulting from u- or o- umlaut.)]

A. adj. The antithesis of GOOD in all its principal senses.

In OE., as in all the other early Teut. langs. exc. Scandinavian, this word is the most comprehensive adjectival expression of disapproval, dislike, or disparagement. In mod. colloquial Eng. it is little used, such currency as it has being due to literary influence. In quite familiar speech the adj. is commonly superseded by bad; the sb. is somewhat more frequent, but chiefly in the widest senses, the more specific senses being expressed by other words, as harm, injury, misfortune, disease, etc.

Ex- prefix^{1}, of Latin origin.

I. repr. L. ex-, the prep. ex (see prec.) in combination.

1. In Latin the form ex- appears before vowels and h; also before c, p (exc. in ĕpotâre, ĕpŏtus), q, s, t; before f it becomes ef- (in inscriptions ec-: cf. Gr. ἐκ); before other consonants (exc. in exlex) it becomes ē. All these various forms are represented in many Eng. derivatives; e.g. ebullient, effervesce, extend. An s following the prefix was in mediæval spelling commonly omitted, and this practice has been adopted in English orthography, as in exert, extinct; in some scientific terms, however, the s has been retained in order to exhibit the composition more clearly, as in exsert to protrude (etymologically = exert), exsanguineous, exsiccate. The euphonic rules affecting the prefix in class. Lat. did not prevail in vulgar Lat., the universal form being ex-, represented in Romanic by es- (see ES-). In OF. and in ME., words with the prefix es- were occasionally written with ex-, after the analogy of words adopted from Latin; a few of these refashioned forms remain in mod. Eng., as exchange, expound.

When it has primary or secondary stress, the prefix is pronounced (eks); in unstressed position this remains before a (written) cons., though in southern usage (éks) is commonly substituted; before a stressed vowel the pronunciation is usually (egz), becoming (ĕgz) in southern speech; this rule, however, has many exceptions, chiefly in rare words and in words affected by the analogy of cognates differently accented.

2. The Lat. compounds of ex- chiefly belong to the following classes, all which are represented by English derivatives. 1. Verbs formed from other verbs; in some of these ex- has its primary force of 'out', 'forth', as in exclūdĕre, exīre (whence Eng. exclude, exit); in some it means 'upward', as in extollĕre (whence Eng. extol); in others it has the sense 'thoroughly', as in excruciāre (whence Eng. excruciate). 2. Verbs formed from adjs., with general sense 'to bring into a certain state', as exacerbāre, exasperāre (whence Eng. exacerbate, exasperate). 3. Verbs formed from sbs.; some of these are really formed on phrases in which ex governs the sb., and have the senses 'to remove, expel, or relieve from (that which is denoted by the sb.)', as excūsāre, expatriāre, exonerāre (whence Eng. excuse, expatriate, exonerate); others have the sense 'to deprive of (what is denoted by the sb.)', as excoriāre, excorticāre (whence Eng. excoriate, excorticate). 4. Adjs. formed from sbs., with the general sense 'deprived of something', as exsanguis bloodless (whence Eng. exsanguineous); in imitation of these, many terms of mod. science have been formed in which ex- has the non-Latin sense 'destitute of', as exalbuminous, exstipulate; the form e- (see E- *pref.*3) has however more frequently been employed, even where Lat. euphony would require ex-, as in ecaudate.

II. Ex- (with hyphen) prefixed to Eng. words.

3. Prefixed to titles of office or dignity, to form designations for persons who have formerly held the position in question. In more restricted sense these compounds denote the immediate predecessor (when still living) of the present holder of the position. After the analogy of these words, ex- is prefixed indiscriminately, with the sense expressed by 'former', 'sometime', 'quondam', to sbs. designating persons with respect to their calling, station, character, or the like.

[On the analogy of forms of expression like ex exsule consul, '(that has become) a consul from an exile', the phrases ex consule, ex magistro equitum, etc. were in the Latin of the empire added as titles to the names of men who had filled the offices of consul, master of the horse, etc. At a later period these phrases gave rise to the compounds ex-consul, ex-magister, in the same manner as the compounds proconsul, proprætor had been developed from the older pro consule, pro prætore. In med. Lat. this usage was greatly extended, such forms as ex-Augustus ('ex-emperor') being of frequent occurrence. Some words of this formation (e. g. ex-professor) passed in adapted forms into It. and Fr., and on the analogy of these ex- was prefixed to Romanic words. The Eng. use, imitated from Fr., seems to have first become common towards the end of the 18th c.]

b. When the designation to which ex- is prefixed is a phrase, the hyphened prefix has the appearance of being attached simply to the first word. Hence ex- occas. occurs in actual combination with an adj., with sense 'formerly'.

1809 SYD. SMITH in Edin. Rev. XIV. 44 He should recollect that his Methodists are the ex-party.

Ex- prefix^{2}, of Greek origin. The Gr. ἐξ out of, etymologically = L. ex- (see prec.) occurs only before vowels, as in the words adopted into Eng. in the forms exanthema, exarch, exegesis, exodus, exorcize, etc. Before consonants it is replaced by the related and synonymous form ek-, which becomes ec- in Latin, and hence in the Eng. derivatives, as ecbasis, eccentric, eclipse, ecstasy, etc.

6. Formal interrogation, esp. of a witness, or an accused person. Examination-in-chief, that made by the party calling the witness. See CROSS-, RE-EXAMINATION. † Also, Interrogation under torture.

The judicial interrogation of accused persons has no place in the criminal process of the common law, but by various statutes from 16th c. justices of the peace were directed to 'take the examination' of prisoners before sending them for trial. This expression has survived, though the practice which it denotes no longer exists; hence the preliminary investigation before justices of the peace or police-magistrates is still called the examination of the prisoner, so that the word in this connexion has reverted to the obsolete sense 2 b.

Excelsior (ekse·lsiɔr). [L., compar. deg. of excelsus high: see Excelse.]

‖ 1. a. The Latin motto ('higher') on the seal of the State of New York (adopted by the senate of that state 16 Mar. 1778), the accompanying device being a rising sun. Hence attrib. in The Excelsior State, New York. b. Used by Longfellow (quasi-int. as an expression of incessant aspiration after higher attainment) as the refrain of a popular poem; hence employed with similar sense by many later writers.

The adverbial meaning (='upwards') commonly given to the motto cannot be justified by L. grammar. According to S. Longfellow Life H. W. Longfellow I. 384, the poet was at first unaware of the solecism in the motto as thus interpreted, and when it was pointed out to him suggested that the word might be taken to stand for Scopus mens excelsior est, 'My goal is higher.' It is not clear whether the original use on the seal is a blunder, or whether it was meant as an abbreviation for some grammatically admissible phrase.

B. prep.

1. In ME., in the construction A. 3, the pple., like its synonym out-taken, might precede the sb. When this collocation of a pple. ceased to be idiomatic, except became a prep., with the sense: Excepting, with the exception of, save, but.

Owing to the rarity of instances in which an inflected pron. takes the place of a sb., it is impossible to say definitely how soon the change in the grammatical character of the word took place, but it had prob. begun before 16th c. Cf. Fr. excepté and hormis, which are now treated as preps. Possibly the word was sometimes taken as the imperative of Except v.; cf. excipe in the Eton Latin Syntax.

4. 'That species of mercantile transactions by which the debts of individuals residing at a distance from their creditors are cancelled without the transmission of money' (McCulloch), by the use of 'bills of exchange'.

The simplest case of such a transaction is when two merchants in one place are respectively debtor and creditor for equal amounts to two merchants in a distant place. The two debts may be settled by the two creditors exchanging their claims; the process being that one of the creditors draws a 'bill of exchange' on his distant debtor, and sells it to his neighbour for its value in present money; the latter sends it as payment of his debt to his creditor, who thus obtains a claim upon a neighbour in exchange for his claim on a person at a distance. In practice the matter is much more complicated, and the term Bill of Exchange has acquired an extended signification from which the etymological notion has almost disappeared (see BILL sb.[3] 9). By writers on the theory of finance exchange is used for the whole system of transactions effected by 'bills of exchange', and is formally divided into Inland and Foreign Exchange. But in practice (exc. in the term bill of exchange itself) the word now almost exclusively means foreign exchange, and in this use has a mixed notion of sense 3; the price at which a bill drawn on a foreign country for a given amount may be bought being subject to variations, depending (1) on the varying relation in intrinsic value between the coins of the two countries; (2) on the varying demand for bills; and (3) on the length of time for which the bill has to run.

Par of exchange: the recognized standard value of the coinage of one country in terms of the coinage of another; e.g. £1 sterling at par = 25·22½ francs French money. Rate or Course of exchange (also simply exchange): (a) the price at which bills drawn in the currency of a foreign country may be purchased; (b) sometimes, the percentage by which this differs from par; e.g. 'the (rate of) exchange has risen from 9½ to 10 p. c.' Arbitration of exchange: see ARBITRATION.

Economic writers distinguish between the real par of exchange, which is the relation in intrinsic value existing between the coins of two nations, and the nominal or conventional par, which may for convenience be maintained at a fixed level. When the price that must be paid for a foreign bill exceeds par, the exchange is said to be against, or unfavourable to, the country in which the bill is drawn; when the price is below par, the exchange is in favour of that country.

II. The King's Exchequer.

2. Under the Norman and Angevin kings of England: An office or department of state managed by the Treasurer, the Justiciary and the other judges of the King's Court, and certain Barons appointed by the King. Its functions combined the collection and administration of the royal revenues with the judicial determination of all causes relating to revenue. In the subsequent development of this institution, it was gradually divided into two distinct branches, the one being charged with judicial, the other with administrative functions: see 3, 4.

The name originally referred to the table covered with a cloth divided into squares, on which the accounts of the revenue were kept by means of counters. It is disputed whether the application of the word to the treasury and the tribunal connected with it originated in Normandy, or whether it was imported into Normandy from England. After Normandy became part of France, the supreme court of law in that province continued to bear the name of eschequier until the reign of Francis I, when this name was superseded by that of parlement.

c. Exchequer of the Jews (L. scaccarium Judæorum): in the thirteenth century, a department of the Exchequer which had charge of the collection of the revenues exacted from the Jews. (See C. Gross Exchequer of the Jews in Papers read at the Anglo-Jewish Exhibition, 1887.)

3. (More fully Court of Exchequer, Exchequer of Pleas.) A court of law, historically representing the Anglo-Norman exchequer in its judicial capacity. By the Judicature Act of 1873 it was converted into 'The Exchequer Division' of the High Court of Justice, and by Order in Council in 1881 this was merged in the Queen's Bench Division.

The jurisdiction of the court was theoretically confined to matters of revenue, but in practice was gradually extended to all kinds of cases (except 'real actions') by means of the legal fiction that the wrong suffered by the plaintiff had rendered him unable to pay his debts to the king. In addition to its jurisdiction at common law, the court had a jurisdiction in equity, abolished in 1841. In its latest form it consisted of the Chief Baron and five judges, called the Barons of the Exchequer; the Chancellor of the Exchequer was in theory a member of it, and was entitled to a voice in its decisions when it sat in equity.

4. The office or department of the public service, which is charged with the receipt and custody of the moneys collected by the several departments of revenue.

In early use not distinguished from TREASURY; but the department of state called the Treasury has not since the 15th century exercised directly the function etymologically indicated by its name. The office charged with the custody of the revenues was in theory a branch of the Court of Exchequer (see 3), and was sometimes called the Lower Exchequer, the Exchequer of Receipt, or Receipt of Exchequer, to distinguish it from the judicial branch (Exchequer of Pleas). By the Exchequer and Audit Act 1866, the offices of Comptroller of the Exchequer and Auditor General, and the departments over which they presided, were united.

A med.L. accisia is mentioned by Du Cange (who gives no quots.) as occurring in imperial documents as a variant of assisa (see ASSIZE); this may be a latinization of the MDu. word. In Du. the two words accijs 'excise' and assijs 'assize' have been to a great extent confused, having both the meaning 'tax'; the Du. etymologists regard the former as a corruption of the latter, and the form accijns as a further corruption due to confusion with cijns, Lat. census. By Lat. writers in the Low Countries (16-17th c.) the word is often rendered by excensus. The notion of derivation from L. excīsum 'something cut out' (cf. EXCISE v.[1]) may have been the cause of the substitution of ex- for ac- in the MDu. form.]

2. spec. 'A duty charged on home goods, either in the process of their manufacture or before their sale to the home consumers' (Encycl. Brit.). In England this kind of taxation was first adopted in 1643, in acknowledged imitation of the example of Holland. It long continued to be highly unpopular: see Johnson's definition below.

The taxes levied under the name of Excise by the Ordinance of 1643 included certain duties imposed, in addition to the customs, on various foreign products; it was not until the present century that the actual use of the word became strictly conformed to the preceding definition.

Exhaust (egzō·st), sb. [f. EXHAUST v.] The process or means of exhausting.

1. a. Steam-engine. The exit of steam from the cylinder after having done its work in propelling the piston; the passage through which this takes place; = EDUCTION 5. (Also in similar sense with reference to water-power and gas engines.)

Etymologically, this is appropriate only to the case of a low-pressure engine, in which the steam is literally 'exhausted' from the cylinder by opening communication with the condenser; but when high-pressure engines were introduced, the word continued to be used as a synonym of EDUCTION, which it has almost superseded.

1848 Pract. Mech. Jrnl. I. 44, I have before seen double valves with the duplex steam passages, but in all of them the exhaust was single. 1865 BURGH Slide Valve 71 In some instances an increase is deemed necessary to allow a more free exhaust. 1875 MARTIN Winding Mach. 76 Back-pressure in the exhaust, owing to the large masses of steam which are suddenly let out through contracted..passages. 1887 J. ‖ Extra (e'kstră), prep. rare. [L. extrā (earlier extrād) outside (adv. and prep.), contracted form of exterā(d), abl. fem. of exter (see EXTERIOR) in phrase exterā parte on the outer side.] Outside, externally to.

1852 W. GROVE in Phil. Trans. CXLII. 87 There was some effect exhibited extra the voltaic circuit.

Extra- (e'kstră), prefix. The L. adv. and prep. extrā (see prec.) does not, strictly speaking, occur in composition during the classical period, though post-classically it formed a few vbs. like extrāclūdĕre to shut out, extrāvagārī to wander outside (whence extravagant). Classical L. had however the adj. extraordinārius EXTRAORDINARY, f. phrase extrā ordinem outside the regular order, and late L. also extrāmundānus EXTRAMUNDANE, f. phrase extrā mundum, extrāmūrānus (cf. EXTRAMURAL) f. extrā mūrum (or mūrōs), extrānātūrālis 'extra-natural', f. extrā nātūrām. Many similar adjs. were formed in med.L. on phrases in which extrā is a prep., and some of these are adopted in Eng., as extra-provincial. As the suffix employed in such formations was nearly always identical with that used to form an adj. from the sb. governed by extra, the words have the appearance of being f. extra- + adj. (the actual formation, on extra prep. + sb. + suffix, being obscured); thus extraordinary is felt as meaning 'outside of what is ordinary'. In recent times an enormous number of adjs. of this type have been formed. The most important compounds of extra-, and those requiring etymological explanation, are given in their alphabetical place; of the remainder only a selection can be given in the following lists, many nonce-words of obvious meaning being omitted.
